We offer comprehensive solutions for all of your accommodation needs, expertly managing every aspect, from site selection and logistics, right through to offering bespoke solutions.

Environment

Floating accommodation requires minimal site preparation and remediation before and after deployment, reducing the CO2 emitted per year compared to land-based accommodation.

Once we float away at the end of the project, there is little or no evidence of us being there.

Our accommodation needs minimal infrastructure, and unlike accommodation villages or modular land camps, doesn't require land clearing.

At the end of charter, we can float away without the need to return large areas of land back to their original state; something which can be a time-consuming, costly and carbon-emitting addition to a big project.

We know the environment is hugely important to our customers, which is why we commissioned an independent environmental evaluation of our floating accommodation compared to land-based accommodation.

The results were very positive for us, and having measured our carbon footprint over the past few years, show that improvements we have been making are really paying off.

Performing better in terms of CO2 emissions with more compact constructions and lower heating and cooling demands compared to land-based accommodation.

The efficiency of our vessels is excellent. We've worked to improve the insulation on our accommodation, and our vessels are performing well in both cool and tropical climates.

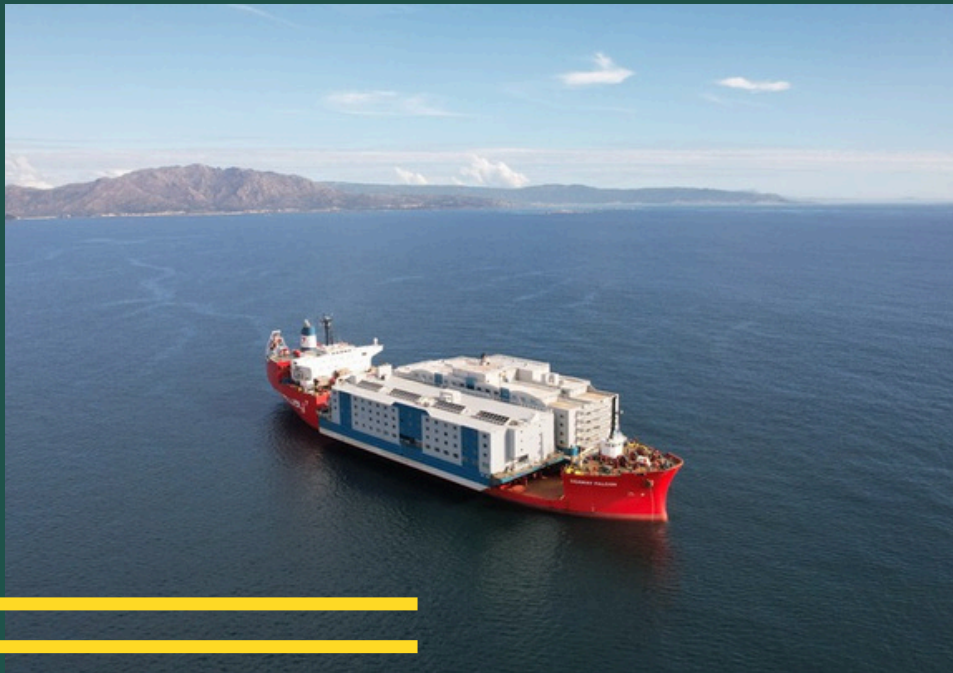

Because our vessels are more compact constructions, they have lower heating and cooling demands compared to land based accommodation villages, which are spread out over a large area.

“We chose to work with Bibby because of the people. From the very beginning - sales, contracting, right through to delivery and operation - everyone was open, transparent, and genuinely committed to making our project a success. They didn't just support us; they helped us support our own customer. It's that people-first approach that made all the difference.”
